TEXTUAL ANALYSIS

Q1]

Albert Edward Foreman as described in the given text is a round character. He was someone who is devoted towards his job and his duties. This is made clear when his thoughts of serving the church till his last breath are shown. He is practical and works according to the need of the hour while being clear about his own capabilities. When he was offered a time of three months to learn reading and writting, he respectivly and calmly refused the offer consedering his prior experience. He also recovers from this hard fact of leaving the church and moves on in his life. He is also an opportunist, when he realised that the market street lacked a little shop with tobacco and sweets, he grabbed this chance to kickstart his business and when one shop became succesful he eventually scaled the business upto 10 shops. But still, after this success, he remains grateful and admires being the verger of St. Peter's, Neville Square.

Q2)

Albert Edward Foreman's ~~last~~ or Statement of still ~~b~~ admiring being a verger of St. Peter's, Neville square is an situational irony. For a normal person, it is quite understood that one might choose an successful respectable thriving business over being verger of a church but Foreman surprised the bank manager along with the readers with his final statement This shows his deep respect towards the work of verger which he considered as services. He is grateful towards the church which made his living ever since when he was twelve and dreams of serving the church till his last breath. Going from only a handful amount of money to having over thirty thousand pounds in bank didnt change who he was and how was his personality. This irony ends the story pretty well with Foreman delivering that quite unexpected statement
